It wasn't predestined for me to become a musician.

As a child, born in New York and raised between Romandy and Zurich, constantly exposed to changes and new cultures, music was only a quiet companion.

It wasn't until I was 16 that I discovered my love for singing through acting and began teaching myself to play the guitar.

With my broad range of interests and various talents, I decided to study Environmental Sciences at ETH Zurich and maybe pursue music later. All the pauses from playing guitar eventually paid off, and in 2017, I stood on stage for the first time at an Open Mic. What started as just fun later wouldn't let go of me.

One step led to another, and what was a small thing at first changed everything. I met Claire Braun during my first band project. After I had to leave the band, she encouraged me to continue making music, organized gigs for me, and introduced me to the music industry. Our dream was to one day form a band together. But sadly, she left this world far too soon, and I thought I had lost my passion for music with her. But it rebuilt itself, stronger than ever, and to carry on her legacy, I took on her last name and became Gini Brown.

Despite her presence in spirit, I didn't want to make music alone, and a year later, at my first opening show for the former band Claire and I were in, I met Sabina, my guitarist. Suddenly, I felt what Gini Brown could become. I felt that I wanted and could do more, so in 2021, I quit my job as a scientist to fully commit to music.

Now, together with my team, we've finished our first two singles, and I know: this is just the beginning of something big!

Cathartic guitar sounds, captivating vocals, and profound lyrics. That is Gini Brown.
